

Crystallising Worlds

Works by

Evan Bond, Ali Kamalati and Thomas Owen

From the exhibition Cystallising Worlds
featuring Sharon Adokorach, Evan Bond, Ali
Kamalati, Thomas Owen and Amita
Ramchandani.

Curated by Isabel Jones and Nicola McEvoy.

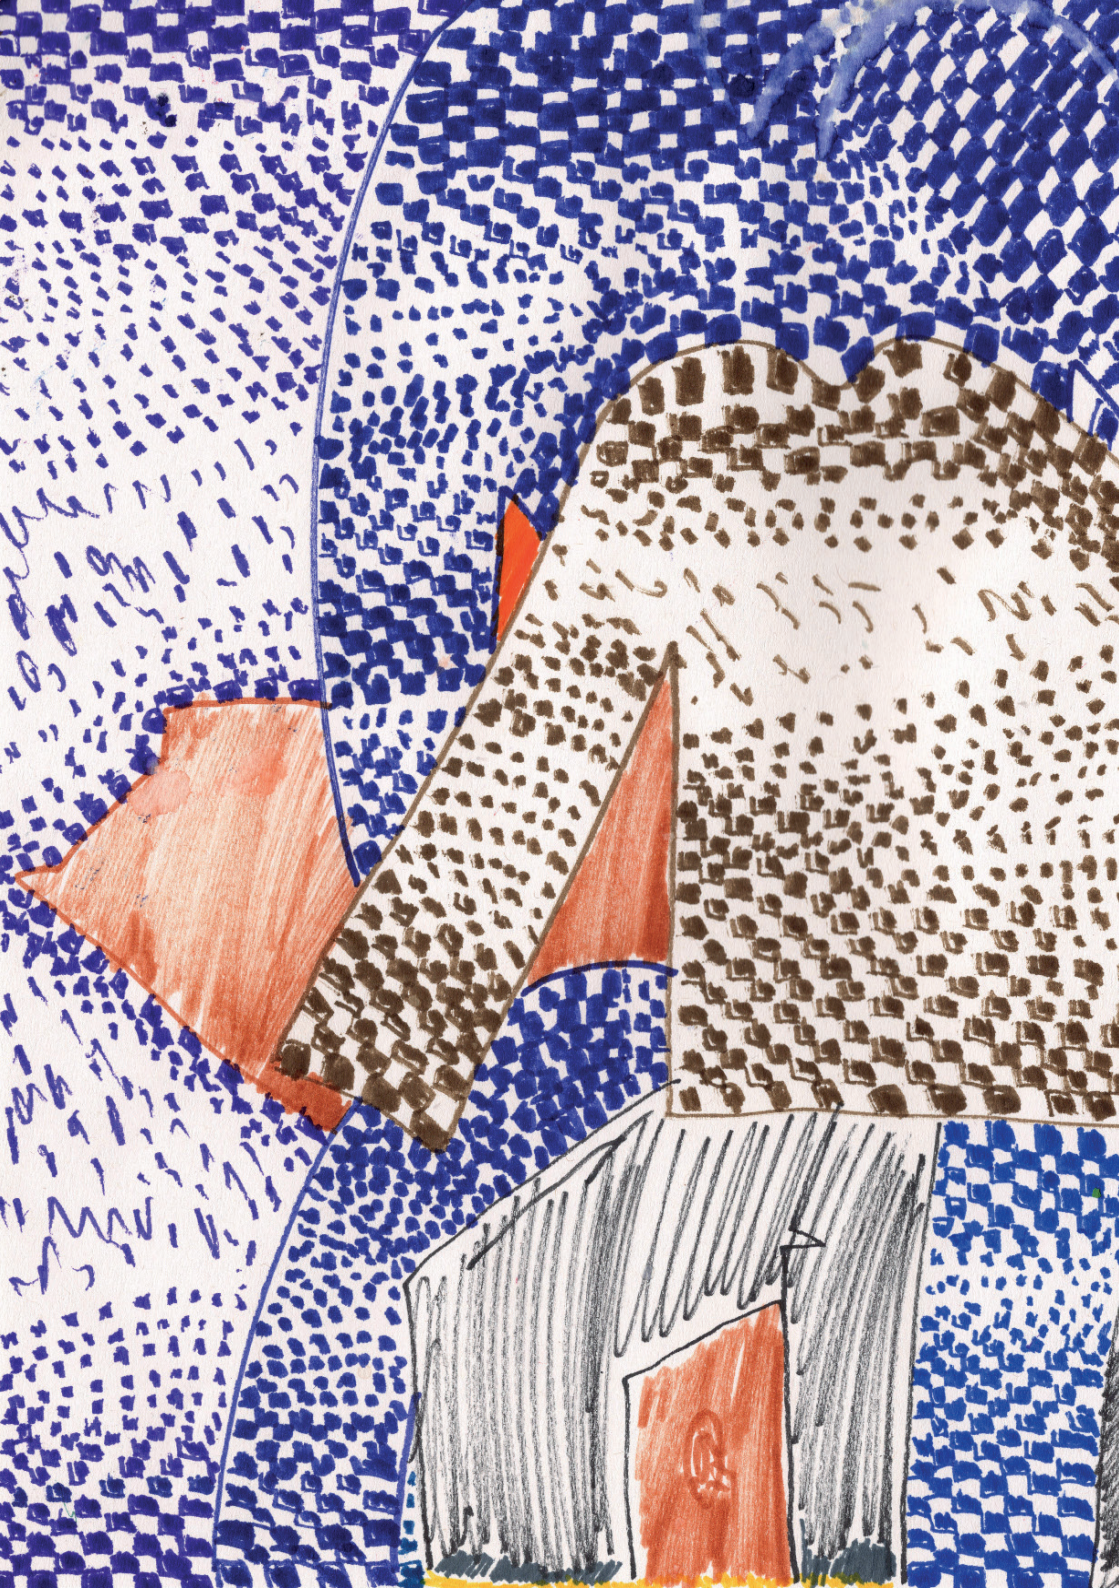

Responding to current social and political happenings, Evan Bond's drawings imagine dystopian futures. Transformed into experimental animations, he narrates wondrous science fictions interwoven with the absurdity of day-to-day humdrum.

This is a piece parodying technology. In this instance, advertising, and how it controls the population. For the decade we are in, I feel advertising has become a powerful tool, surpassing politics as what controls society. As I walk past an advertising company every day, I see all the men that look the same and their female counterparts.

Thomas Owen creates complex and layered worlds of patterns, figures and jumpers that call attention to often overlooked details. He deconstructs his surroundings, producing detailed depictions of the everyday. Tom brings the surreal out of the mundane, reformulating his environment into a new perspective of the world.

ActionSpace

Each artist in this exhibition engages in a form of worldbuilding practice. The artists develop their work with the support of ActionSpace.

ActionSpace is a visual arts organisation that supports learning disabled artists across London. They seek out and unlock talent, and create bespoke opportunities for learning disabled artists to realise their potential. ActionSpace has an exceptional reputation for providing long-term supported studio practice and delivering high-quality professional artistic development through mentoring, exhibitions and a network of partnerships with cultural organisations.

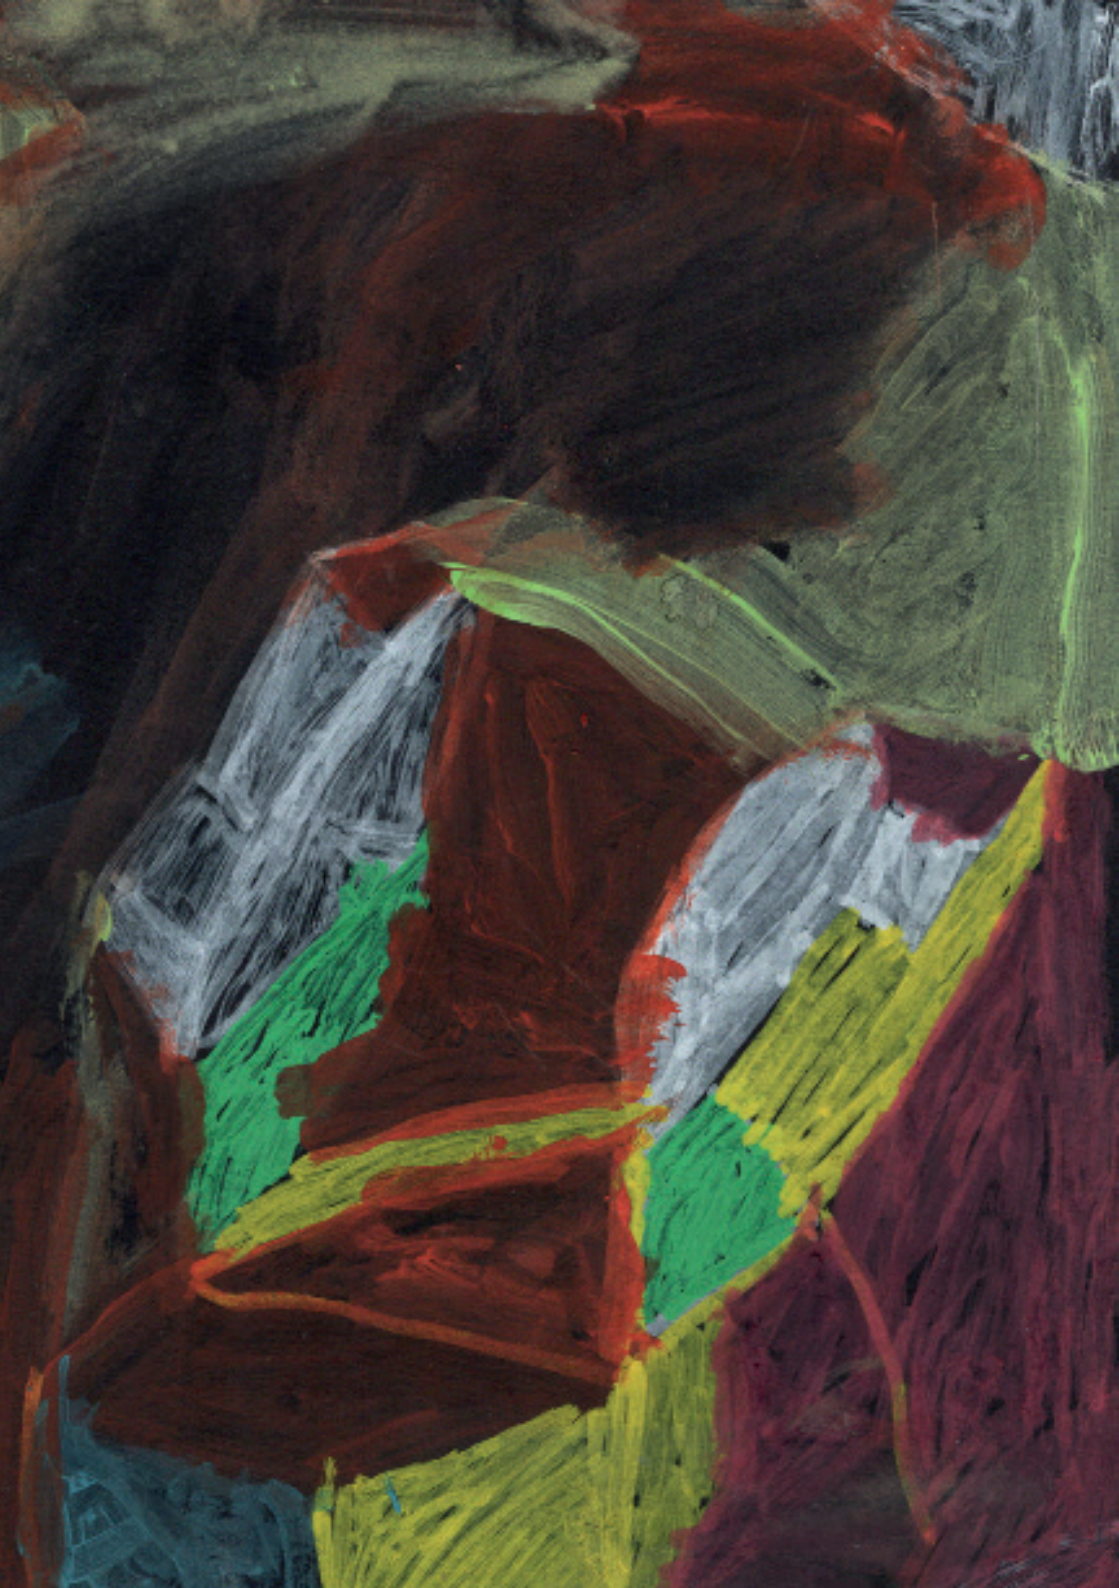

Ali Kamalati conjures landscapes through gestural strokes and text-like forms. Ali's figures bring ground to his paintings, transforming abstract marks into whimsical lands.
